Planes, pollution, planning and politics

Explore life in the shadow of a busy international airport

Going for a walk close to one of the world's busiest international airports might seem a strange choice. Yet right on the edge of London Heathrow is a surprising landscape of natural scenery and historic villages.

Find out why this site was originally chosen for the airport and how politicians have struggled ever since to manage its growth. Stand on the centre line of a proposed new runway and hear arguments for and against airport expansion.

On the other hand, discover how planning regulations have helped to protect buildings and preserve a green haven for birds and wildflowers.

Visit a barn which poet John Betjeman described as the 'Cathedral of Middlesex' and enjoy a restored moor that has earned the Wildlife Trusts' Biodiversity Benchmark.

This is a place where people and planes co-exist, and where planners and politicians battle over their future.
